Ty, obs. form of Tie.

-ty, *suffix*1, denoting quality or condition, representing ME. -tie, -tee, -te (early ME. -teð), from OF. -te (mod.F. -té), earlier -tet (-ted):—L. -tātem, nom. -tās. Such Latin types as bonitātem, feritātem, were in OF. normally reduced to two syllables (bonitet, fertet) by elision of the -t- between the two stresses, so that -tet, later -te, became the regular form of the suffix. The final dental still appears in some early adoptions in ME., as plentеð, plenteth plenty (c 1250, in use till c 1600), and is characteristic of the Scottish forms bountith, daintith, and poortith (q. v.). The reduced form -te, however, is found in words recorded from shortly before or after 1200, such as bonte bounty, cruelte cruelty, debonerte debonairness, deinte dainty (sb.), plente plenty, poverte poverty, purte purity, and vilte vileness. Among others which appear somewhat later are certeynte certainty, Cristente Christenty, frcelte frailty, nouelte novelty, and sotelte subtlety. Varying forms of the stem are found in the words now or formerly represented by beauty, fealty, lealty, †lewty, loyalty, †realty, †rialty, and royalty. From the types lealte, realte, the ending -alte (mod.F. -auté) was in OF. extended to formations from different stems, and many words of this form (ultimately written with -alty) established themselves in English, as admiralty, casualty, commonalty, †generally, mayoralty, †principalty, †regalty, severalty, specialty, spiritualty, temporalty. Most of these date from the 14th or early 15th century; penalty appears to be of later introduction (1512). An obsolete type of formation is exhibited by curiouste, hid(e)ouste, and joyouste. In OF. certain analogies led to the frequent substitution of -ete for -te, but this form of the suffix is only occasionally adopted in English, as in the obsolete noblete, purete, and simplete; the early saunete is now represented by safety. Under Latin influence many words in OF. also appear with -ite (mod.F. -ité) in place of -(e)te; hence English forms in -ity, which in many cases (as in F.) have supplanted those in -ty.

Although occurring in a large number of words the suffix has shown little productive power in English; eveite, everlastingte, and overte occur in the 14–15th cent., and shrievalty, sheriffalty, have had currency from the beginning of the 16th cent., but such formations are very rare.

Such words as faculty, difficulty, honesty, modesty, puberty, represent Latin formations in which the suffix -tās is directly added to a consonantal stem. The number of these in English, as in French, is very small.

The early form of the suffix (-te, or -t-e) remained in use down to the 16th cent., but from the 15th was gradually supplanted by -tie, -tye, and the surviving -ty.

-ty, *suffix*2, denoting 'ten', forming the second element of the decade numerals from 20 to 90 (in OE. to 120), as twenty, thirty (OE. twentig, þrittig), etc. The OE. -tig (gen. sing. -tiges, gen.pl. -tiga, -tigra, dat. pl. -tigum) corresponds to OFris. -tich, -tech (pl. -tiga, -tega), MDu. -tich (Du. -tig), OS. -tig (-tehig), -teg, -tich, -tech (MLG. and LG. -tig), OHG. -zug, -zuc, -zoch (MHG. -zec, -zic, G. -zig), and is the same as ON. tigr, tegr, tegr, tugr (pl. tigir, etc.) and Goth. tigus (pl. tigjus), which are not suffixed but remain independent words, as ON. tveir tigir, Goth. twai tigjus, twenty. For examples of the OE. forms and syntactical usage, see the various numerals.

U.

U (yū), the 21st letter of the modern English, and the 20th of the ancient Roman alphabet, was in the latter identical in form and origin with V (q.v.), the same symbol being employed both as a vowel and a consonant. In Latin MSS. written in capitals the form V is retained; but in uncial MSS., of which the earliest specimens belong to the third or fourth century, the modified form ᑌ appears, and is continued in the later half-uncial (from c 500) and minuscule MSS. (from the eighth century) as ų. In Anglo-Saxon MSS. the latter form (ų) was regularly employed as a minuscule to denote the vowel u, the corresponding form in capitals being either V or ų. In early MSS. u and us are also employed with the value of w, and very rarely u in place of b (later f) to denote intervocalic v; in late MSS. the substitution of u for f (= v) becomes fairly common, usually between vowels but sometimes also initially. In M.E., after continental usage, the two symbols u and v were employed, but without clear distinction in value, each of them being used to denote either the vowel u or the consonant v. The practice with regard to the employment of the two forms varied considerably, but the general tendency was to write v initially and u in other positions, regardless of phonetic considerations, e.g. vnder, vpon, vse but cure, full, huge, and vain, vice, vile but saue, euer, giuen. For the sake of clearness, however, v was frequently preferred to u, especially in conjunction with n and m, as in vnne, vowne, mvse. (In Scottish MSS. intervocalic u with the value of v is much rarer than in English, its place being largely taken by f, ff, v or w.) The early printers followed the common usage with regard to u and v in small letters; in capitals they employed only one symbol, viz. 𝔘 in black letter, and V in Roman. During the sixteenth century, however, continental printers began to distinguish between u and v, using the former as a vowel and the latter as a consonant. The distinction is found in Italian printing as early as 1524, but its general introduction dates from 1559–60, when it was employed in the Grammatica of Ramus; apparently the innovation was due to the printer rather than to the author. In English there were several attempts to introduce the distinction before 1600; after 1600 it rapidly became more common, and had come to be general by 1630. In capitals, however, V for some time continued to serve in the old double function, although ų had been introduced in the work of Ramus. This was subsequently adopted and remained the usual form for the capital vowel until the close of the 17th century, after which it rapidly gave way to U, a form which is employed, though at first sparingly, from at least 1625. (In italic type the vowel was V, the consonant V.) From about 1700 the regular forms have been U ų for the vowel, and V v for the consonant.

One result of the long-continued confusion of u and v was that in dictionaries, indexes, etc., words beginning with the vowel and with the consonant were combined in one list, va- being followed by vb- (i.e. ub-), ve- by vf-, etc. This practice was very commonly continued even after the two letters had been distinguished, and in English dictionaries remained as late as Todd's edition of Johnson (1818) and Richardson's dictionary (1837). When the two letters were separated, v- was sometimes placed before u-; a late example of this occurs in Jodrell's dictionary (1820). The modern arrangement, by which u- precedes v-, is found from at least the early part of the 18th cent., and has been usual in English dictionaries from that of Webster (1828) onwards.

In OE. the vowel-sounds denoted by u were those of Latin u, short and long, in the former case corresponding to that of mod.E. pull, bush, in the latter to that of rude, brute. In ME. the short u in native words partly retained its own sound, and was partly altered by lengthening or other phonetic changes; in some words the sound remained while the spelling was altered, as in wolf (OE. wulf), woll (OE. wull). The long u also retained its sound (unless when shortened before certain consonants), but was denoted by the new symbol ou derived from French spelling. Short and long u also freely occurred in words of French and Latin origin, but differed in quality from those of the native words, having the value of ū, ū; in the case of ū the difference continued to be marked, and the resultant sounds are now quite distinct. Under the influence of these forms southern M.E. scribes substituted u for OE. y, ȳ (which had expressed the sounds ü, ǖ), writing cun, cuðen, etc., for OE. cyn, cȳðan, which in midland and northern dialects became kin, kithe.

In mod.E. the short u of OE. (apart from changes due to lengthening, etc.) has normally become ŭ (written u or o), as dumb, sun, thus = OE. dumb, sunne, þus, or sonne, love = OE. sunu, lufu. This change apparently had not proceeded far enough to be clearly noticeable until the middle of the 17th century, and was probably not generally completed until the beginning of the 18th. Over all the north of England, however, and a large part of the midlands, the original sound of u remains in words of this class, and even in standard English it is preserved in a few instances after labial consonants, as in bull, full, pull, bush, put. Short u also has this sound in some common words not of native origin (mostly with labial initials), as bushel, butcher, pudding, pulpit, push, sugar. The OE. ū (ME. ou) has normally become the diphthong (au), written ou or ow, as in thou, town = OE. þū, tūn, but in a few instances has been shortened, as in plum, thumb. The ME. ū from French or Latin, on the other hand, has become the diphthong (iū, iüə), written iu, ue, or u-e, as in huge, mute, future, cure, with reduction to (ū, üə) after s (= ʃ, ʒ), j, and r, as in sure, jury, brute, rule, optionally after l, as in lute, lure, and more widely in American usage. This mode of spelling has also been extended to some native words which originally had a diphthong, and would normally be written with ew, as hue, rue, true, truth (compared with new, grew, strew). The same sounds (iū, ū) are also represented by ui in a few words, as nuisance, bruise, fruit.

In combination with other vowels u is employed in the groups au (ɔ̄), eu (iū), ou (with varying value, as in foul, soul, four, young, route), ue and ui (see above). It is silent after g in many words, as guard, guide, plague, and in final -que, as masque, grotesque. It has the value of w after q in other positions, and in various words after g and s, as queen, quick, inquest; guano, iguana, anguish; suave, persuade, etc.

The name of the letter down to the 16th century was u, pronounced like the long u of French or Latin origin, and consequently undergoing the same change to (iū) which took place in ordinary words. The completion of the change is indicated by the use of the letter (u or v) to represent the personal pronoun you in such passages as Shaks. L.L.L. v. i. 60 and Dekker and Webster Westward Hoe II. i. (Cf. I O U.) In Scotland the name (ū) was locally in use as late as the 19th century.

Ulama, Ulan, variants of ULEMA, UHLAN.

-ular, suffix, representing L. -ulāris (whence also F. -ulaire, Sp. and Pg. -ular, It. -ulare, -olare), formed by the addition of -āris -AR[1] to the diminutive suffix -ul-, and employed in adjs. derived from nouns ending in -ulus, -ula, -ulum, as popŭlāris, rēgŭlāris, sĕcŭlāris, f. populus, rēgulus, sĕculum. A considerable number of these are recorded from classical or post-classical Latin, as angŭlāris, annŭlāris, caniculāris, circulāris, fistulāris, etc., and many of these have at various dates been adopted in English in the forms angular, annular.

etc. Many others are derived either from mediæval or modern Latin formations, or have been directly formed on Latin sbs., as auricular, capsular, cellular, corpuscular, funicular, globular, jugular, etc., the use of the suffix having steadily become more frequent (especially in scientific use) since the 17th century. When the primitive noun as well as the diminutive exists in English, and is in common use, the adj. in -ular is usually associated with it; thus glandular and globular commonly correspond to gland, globe, rather than to glandule, globule. This, however, has not given rise to much independent use of the suffix, which is normally confined to the above types.

1567 Drant Horace, Epist. I. vii. D vj, Our cittizen is now a Corridon. He trimmes his ulmen. 1698 J. Fryer Acc. E. India & P. 195 A Catalogue of Plants growing at Spahaun...Sycamore. Ivy...Poplar. Ulmes. Willows.

Ulmic (ʊ·lmik), a. Chem. [f. L. ulm-us elm, after Ulmin. Cf. F. ulmique, Pg. ulmico.] Ulmic acid: a. = Ulmin I.

A distinction between ulmic acid and ulmin or ulmine has been made by various chemists, but without agreement in the precise application of the terms.

1832 T. Thomson Chem. Inorg. Bodies II. 105 Ulmic acid appears to be a vegetable substance of very great importance...obtained from the exudation of the elm by dissolving the exudation in water and precipitating the ulmic acid. 1836 Brande Man. Chem. 923 As it [sc. ulmin] combines with bases, Boullay terms it ulmic acid...He represents ulmin, or ulmic acid, as a compound [etc.]. 1868 Watts Dict. Chem. V. 936 The name 'ulmic acid', or 'ulmin', was given by Klaproth to a gummy substance contained in the black alkaline excrescences on the stems of unhealthy trees, especially of elms.

b. = Ulmin 2.

1843 Penny Cycl. XXV. 491/1 Ulmic acid plays an important part in manures and soils, and what is called mosswater owes its peculiar properties to its presence. 1868 Watts Dict. Chem. V. 936 The ammoniacal solution .. deposits brown or black gelatinous flocks of ulmic acid.

Ulmin (ʊ·lmin). Chem. Also ulmine. [f. L. ulm-us elm + -IN : named by Thomson. Cf. F. ulmine, Pg. ulmina.]

1. A substance which exudes spontaneously from the inner bark of the elm and some other trees; spec. the final stage of this as a distinct chemical principle.

a. 1813 T. Thomson Syst. Chem. (1817) IV. 48 Ulmin.. was first noticed in 1804, by Klaproth, who found it in a spontaneous exudation from the elm. 1819 Brande Chem. 366 Ulmin is of a brown colour, with scarcely any taste or smell...The exudation from the elm is generally combined with carbonate of potassa, and is therefore readily soluble in water. 1842 Penny Cycl. XXII. 26/1 Simaruba is the bark of the root of the Simaruba amara...Its chief constituents are..ulmin, mucilage, and some salts.

β. 1838 'Upper Proverb. Philos. Notes 219 With reference to the elm, I would remark, that no use has yet been discovered in the principle called 'ulmine'. 1853 Rovle Bot. Mcd. (ed. 2) 632 It [the bark of Elm] contains Tannin..and a peculiar mucilaginous or gummy principle, called Ulmine.

2. A dark-brown or black product resulting from the decay of wood or vegetable matter, or artificially obtained by the action of powerful chemical agents on sugar and some other substances.

a. 1843 Penny Cycl. XXV. 491/1 Ulmin, or ulmic acid, may be artificially obtained..by the following process. 1857 Miller Elem. Chem., Org. 54 If the solution [of sugar] be kept boiling for some hours,..a certain quantity of formic acid, and of a brown sparingly soluble substance termed ulmine, are formed. 1868 Watts Dict. Chem. V. 936 Ulmin is also the name of a brown pigment, produced by the action of strong acids or alkalis on various organic bodies.

β. 1848 Fownes Chem. (ed. 2) 371 note, This [substance] is generally called ulmic or humic acid, and its origin ascribed to the reaction of the alkali on the ulmine or humus of the soil. 1861 Gesner Coal, Petrol., etc. (1865) 128 The decay of wood is produced by oxidation, and ulmine is the result.

U·lmous, a. Chem. [f. as prec. + -ous.] Partaking of the character of ulmin.

1868 Watts Dict. Chem. V. 936 Ulmous or Humous Substances.

-ulose, a compound adjectival suffix representing L. -ulōsus, formed by the addition of -ōsus (see -ose) to stems in -ul-us, -a, -um, as angulōsus from angulus, fābulōsus from fabula, periculōsus from periculum. Such formations are rare in earlier Latin, but a considerable number are employed by post-Augustan writers, as Pliny, Columella, etc. Among the English examples which have their source in classical or post-classical forms are angulose, calculose, fabulose, fistulose, glandulose, nebulose, pustulose, ramulose, sabulose, vermiculose. On the analogy of these, various others have been introduced, as flosculose, globulose, granulose, scrofulose, sticulose, tubulose, tumulose. These forms are parallel to a certain number of those in -ULOUS, being as a rule either obsolete variants of these, or introduced later in order to convey the distinction commonly observed between the endings -OSE and -OUS.

Ulotrichan (yulǫ·trikăn). [Cf. next.] A person belonging to the crisp-haired division of mankind.

1838 Cassell's Encycl. Dict.

-ulous, a compound adjectival suffix representing the two Latin endings -ulōsus and -ulus. In the former case there are frequently variants in -ulose, which in modern use are as a rule more specific in meaning. To this class belong angulous, calculous, fabulous, fistulous, etc. (see -ULOSE); also crapulous, meticulous, populous, scrupulous, etc. The number of purely modern formations is not large. To the group which corresponds to Latin forms in -ulus belong bibulous, credulous, emulous, garrulous, pendulous, sabulous, stridulous, tremulous. In a very few instances both forms occur in Latin, as querulus, rarely querulōsus, querulous; ridiculus, rarely ridiculōsus, ridiculous.

† Umb-, prefix, app. ad. ON. umb- (earlier form of um- UM-), corresponding to MLG. and MHG. umb-, OE. ymb-, emb- (see UMBE-). In ME. this form of the prefix is much rarer than the reduced UM- or the extended UMBE-, and occurs only in the following verbs:—umbeast, to surround; umbelose, to enclose; umbfold, to embrace; umblay, to wrap round; umblook, to look round; umbset, -stead, to surround; umbthink, to bethink (oneself of something).
The OE. ymb- was extensively employed in compound verbs, as ymbclyppan, -lécian, -settan, -sittan, -standan, -tencan, etc., and although not the phonetic antecedent of ME. umb- may have had some influence on its use.

Congress* (ed. 2) § 127 The Umlaut of the Indo-European languages is a phenomenon of a different order. Here the vowel of the after-member of the word influences that which has gone before.

Un-, *prefix*1, expressing negation, representing OE. un-, = OFris. un-, on-, oen- (WFris. ûn-, on-, EFris. ün-, NFris. ün-), MDu. (and Du.) on-, OS. (MLG., LG.,) OHG. (MLG., G.), and Goth. un-, ON. ó-, ú- (Icel. ó-, Sw. o-, Norw. and Da. u-), corresponding to OIr. in-, an-, L. in- (im-, il-, ir-, i-), Gr. ἀν-, ἀ-, Arm. an-, Skr. an-, a-, Indo-Eur. *n, an ablaut-variant of ne not: see Ne. adv. The prefix has been very extensively employed in English, as in the other Germanic languages, and is now the one which can be used with the greatest freedom in new formations.

2. In OE. the number of recorded forms in un- is very large, the prefix being freely applied with a purely negative force to several parts of speech, which may be classified as follows: (a) simple adjectives, as unscead, synfulle, unbræd, unclæne, uncúþ, unsælig, etc.; derivative adjs., as unbeadufol, unbilwit, unclæg, unfæmnedlic, unfæstenlic, unsælenlic, unscæftlic, etc.; and compound forms, as unreaumþrof, un-dópþancol, unfæstrǽd, etc.; (b) simple adverbs, as unéaðe, unefne, unfæcere, unfeorr, etc., and derivative forms, as unclænlice, uncúðlice, uncáðellice, unfæstelice, etc.; (c) past participles of strong and weak verbs, as unbeden, unbegunnen, unboren, undrifen, ungeboden, ungecnáwen, etc., unbyrged, unclǽsed, ungedered, unclænsod, ungeendod, ungehálgod, unboht, etc.; (d) present participles, as unbærnende, unbirnende, uncwaciende, uncwebbende, unflíenде, unlócиende, etc.; (e) simple nouns, as unár, unbeaw, uncyst, unfrið, unlage, unþanc, etc., and derivative forms, as uncláennes, unfagerness, uncdfscipe, unwísdóm, etc. A prominent feature of the OE. examples is the prevalence of long derivative or compound formations, usually based upon, or corresponding to, Latin formations with in-, im-, il-, as unaberendlíc intolerable, unaberendlice intolerably, unbegripendlic incomprehensible, unbeclæwendlice inconsiderately, unforhwefednes incontinence. The greater number of such forms were no doubt artificial, and had little or no currency in ordinary language. In a small number of nouns un- appears with a pejorative in place of a negative sense, as unhát excessive eating, uncoðu an evil disease, uncwrýt an evil art, and similarly undǽd, undóm, unlage, unræd, unsið, untíma, unweder. Altogether the number of un- words recorded in OE. is about 1250, of which barely an eighth part survived beyond the OE. period.

3. The disappearance of so many of the OE. formations left early ME. with a very limited supply of un- words, even when new (or apparently new) examples are added to those inherited from the older language. A fair proportion even of this reduced stock proved unable to survive for more than half a century, and had passed out of use by 1250. A few of these, especially such as obviously had some general currency, are entered in their alphabetical places, but the greater number are given here (together with a few of somewhat later date) as properly belonging to the older period and having no direct influence upon the later development of the prefix. Most of these are composed of purely native elements, but a few show the beginnings of Scandinavian and French influence, as ungrith, unhagerlíp, unskaþeful; unbispused, uncouverlich.

In ME. transcripts of OE. homilies a few additional words are found, as unæfstlendlich, unaesecliche, unieedliche, unisewenlich, untodele(n)dlich, unzearu.

unagi-n a. [cf. Agin v.], without beginning; unane·mned ppl. a. [OE. ánemnan to declare], unnamed, indescribable; unaw·ned ppl. a. [f. native un-. Early examples of forms with un-, which either then or a little later have variants with in-, im-, are unability, uncorrigible, uncorrupt, uncurable, undigen, undiscreet, unmeasurable, unmovable, unnumerable, unperfect, unperfection, unportable, unpossible. Similar formations continued to multiply during the following centuries, so that a large proportion of the words beginning with il-, im-, in-, ir- had corresponding forms in un-, as unadequate, unadvertence, unarticulate, unartificial, unattentive, unaudible, unauspicious, uncapable, etc. The culminating period of the double forms lies in the 17th century; since that time the tendency has been to differentiate, and to discard one or other of the doublets, the forms with in-, etc., being very commonly preferred when the whole word has a distinctively Latin character, as inadequate, inadvertence, inarticulate, etc. Even with such forms there is no absolute rule, and doublets are still numerous, as in- or un-advisable, in- or unalienable, etc. (See IN-2.)

By inadvertence, or simple errors in printing, un- or vn- sometimes appears in works of the 16–17th cent. for in-, im-, or em-, en-, as vncouraged encouraged, vnlarge enlarge, vnplayed employed, vnpoysoning empoisoning, vnflam'd inflamed, vnpostumed imposthumed.

c. When two or more negative terms occurred in the same clause and were coupled by and or or, the prefix was sometimes employed only with the first. The following are examples of this practice, which is especially common in Scottish of the 16th century.

c 1380 Wyclif Wks. (1880) 129 To kepe hym self vnbiekkid or defould fro þis world. c 1460 J. Russell *Bk. d. When un- is prefixed to present or past participles, these are rarely employed in a true participial function, but become adjectival in character. Examples of the present participle, however, occasionally occur with a following object, or with a prepositional construction; and in Scottish use, from at least the 15th century, un- in such cases has acquired the sense of 'without'. More rarely, in the older language, it has the same sense with passive participles. Both constructions are still retained in north-eastern Scottish dialect, with the prefix in the form on or ohn, frequently written separate from the participle. (The spelling ohn is due to, or has led to, a false association with G. ohne without.) Examples of these uses are:—

6. During the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries the use of un- steadily increased, a large number of words being thus formed which have permanently established themselves in the language, besides many more which occur only incidentally or rarely. The freedom with which the prefix could be used in new formations appears clearly in the dictionaries of Florio and Cotgrave, who constantly employ it in rendering Italian and French negative terms in in-, etc. As the use of un- or in- (see 5 b) was still largely a matter of choice, and many of the older formations were still current, the vocabulary of the 17th century exhibits many types in common use which are now rare or obsolete, and in general is extremely rich in words beginning with un-. During the 18th century many of the older forms disappeared, and new formations became more limited in number and variety, but the sense of freedom in the use of the prefix when desired is clearly shown by a large number of the examples given by Ash in his dictionary in 1775. These were obviously manufactured for the purpose, and when added to the genuine words which he has included, make up a total of about 5,000 entries. In this way Ash frequently anticipates the actual introduction of new formations. In the 19th century the use of the prefix became still more common, it being freely applied to almost any adjectival or participial form, until its employment has become almost unrestricted, within certain limits indicated below. On this account it is impossible to make a complete enumeration even of forms which have actually been used, still less of those which may be created at any time.

b. The form of the prefix indicates that it was originally unstressed (although in OE. poetry it may have stress and carry the alliterative letter), and normally it still bears this relationship to the main part of the word. There is, however, considerable tendency to give stress to it in rare or casual formations, and whenever the negation or contrast which it implies is at all emphatic. In such cases the compound may either have two equal stresses, or the prefix may have the stronger stress; the latter degree of emphasis is usually indicated by underlining or italicizing, and the use of the hyphen; e. g. 'he is distinctly un-literary'.

c. The following sections illustrate the usual types of current formations, with illustrations drawn from unimportant modern examples, which might be indefinitely increased. All older examples in actual use, and all words important either in themselves or on account of their source, are given in their alphabetical place in the main series. As a large number of these are purely negative and self-explanatory, the place of a definition is supplied by a reference to the section of this article under which the precise type of formation is explained and illustrated.

The entries in Ash (see above) have been regarded as worthy of note only when they anticipate the appearance of a word in actual use. In these cases a reference to Ash is given within parentheses.

A purely artificial formation (suggested by Euphuistic diction) is un-to-be-imitated (Scott Monast. xx).

7. Un- is freely prefixed to adjectives of all kinds, except where a Latin form in in-, etc., has definitely established itself in common use. Both forms, however, may co-exist, and in some cases a new formation with un- has been introduced when that with in- has acquired a connotation which it is desirable to avoid. The form with un- is then purely negative, while the other may have almost a positive sense, e.g. un-moral in contrast with immoral. (When the form with un- has similarly acquired a positive implication, the simple negative or neutral sense is expressed by the use of Non- or Not-.) There is also considerable restriction in the use of un- with short simple adjectives of native origin, the negative of these being naturally supplied by another simple word of an opposite signification. There is thus little or no tendency now to employ such forms as unbroad, undeep, unwide, unbold, unglad, ungood, unstrong, unwhole, unfew, etc., which freely occur in the older language. On the other hand, derivative forms in -al, -ant, -ar, -ary, -ent, -ful, -ic, -ical, -ite, -ish, -ive, -ly, -ory, -ous, -y, etc., are too numerous to be completely recorded. The general character of the less usual or permanent of these and other adjectival forms is illustrated by the following examples, which are restricted to such as are recorded before 1890, and could be indefinitely increased by the addition of later or less noteworthy material.

In dictionaries of various dates many formations are given of which no real instance has been found. Levins (1570) has unhateful, unprecious. Florio (1598 and 1611) renders equivalent Italian words in in- by such forms as unavailful, unbridle, uncheerfulnuall, uncozy, unempty, unfruit, unnice, unoffensible, unopen, unplentiene, unthrift, unvalorous. Ash (1775) gives unalphabetical, unattendant, uncohesive, uncompatible, uncompressible, uncomputative, etc. (about 80 in all). Later dictionaries (Webster, Worcester, etc.), with or without indication of source, have the entries unabundant, unbiographical, uncogent, uncollectible, undeceptive, undeliberative, etc.

8. The prefixing of un- to past participles, common in OE. and revived in ME., was subsequently extended until it became the commonest of all uses of the prefix. The following varieties may be distinguished in the usual formations :

a. Simple past pples. in -ed. These form an inexhaustible class, largely represented among the main words, and including many more similar to those in the following list.

A few casual forms are employed by Florio (1611), as uncomprehended, unnotted, and various others by Hexham (1648), as unbuisamed, unbevilshilled, unblued, uncalumniated, unchecked, etc. Another early Caxtonian type of formation to great lengths, and enters about 800 words which are either not recorded, or are of rare occurrence, in actual use, as unadetted, unaccited, unacquitted, unadjudged, unaltered, unamplified, unapriated, etc.

As subdivisions of this type, forms in -ated and -ized may be specially noted on account of their frequency. These are also largely represented in Ash's dictionary, which contains about 150 instances of each. Examples are unaccentuated, uncamphorated, uncircumstantiated, etc., and a score or so in -ised, as unapostrophised, unaromatised, uncantonised, etc.

On the double meaning of forms like undressed, unhoused, unsheathed, etc., see Us.[2] 8.

(b) Last pples. with other endings, from strong or weak verbs. These form a much smaller class, but include a considerable number in common use, as unbegun, unblown, unborn, unbought, etc. A few are found with -ate for -ated, as unevaporate, -exaggerate, but these and others not permanently established in the language are of rare occurrence.

Examples in Ash are unbeset, uncast, uninterwoven, unshaken, unshown, unsung, etc.

c. Participial formations with un- frequently have a suffixed adverb or preposition (usually with a hyphen when the formation is used attributively). An early example of this is unborne-away (Caxton, 1483) ; others make their appearance in the 16th and 17th centuries, as uncalled-for, uncared-for, unheard-of, unlooked-for, unthought-of, etc. A number of these have become permanent and are in general use; the following are examples of more casual formations.

1611 H. Spencer in Cowper Mem. Mag. 613 Exceptions communities unaggressive and from special causes "unaggressed upon. 1858 Froude Hist. Eng. IV. 496 Unvouched for, "unalluded to by any contemporary authority as yet discovered. 1884 Pall Mall G. 29 Aug. 1/2 You have allowed your conduct to remain unexplained and "unapologised for. 1858 Browning *Bp. d. A type of formation which is not very frequent is that in which the participle is preceded by a noun, usually with instrumental sense, as in the following examples.

1884 Athenæum (1882) 56 For not...aged censoring Cato might challenge greater priniledge of truethe, then your free toongel and "un-aw-bound skill. 1765 [E. 9. Adjectival forms in -ed, from substantives, of the type unbearded, unbodied, unfeathered, etc. These are anticipated in OE. by such rare formations as ungefepered, ungewintred, unwidded, but otherwise belong to the 16th and subsequent centuries. The usual sense is 'not provided or furnished with', but sometimes 'not affected by', 'not treated with', etc.; in the latter case the use is not clearly distinguishable from the purely participial.

Ash gives such instances as unaproned, unbrooched, unbuskined, unchevroned, unclentched, uncoldized, etc.

10. The use of un- with present participles, revived about 1300 (see 4 above), subsequently became common, and has given rise to a large number of permanent words, such as unbecoming, unbending, unchanging, undoubting, etc. (On the participial use of such forms see 5 d.) Examples of casual formations are given below.

11. In OE. adverbial formations in -like formed a large portion of the words in un-. Very few of these survived in ME., but additions were gradually made which maintained the existence of the type (ending in -liche in southern dialects and -ly in the northern). Subsequently the use of un- with -ly again became common, independent of the form of the central element, which may be an adjective, present or past pple., etc. There are however two ways in which such formations may arise. Either the suffix -ly is added to a form already beginning with un-, or un- is prefixed to an adverb already formed with -ly. In most cases the difference in sense is slight or immaterial, but at times the distinction becomes important. If unprofessionally is formed from unprofessional it means 'at variance with, contrary to, professional rules or etiquette', if from professionally it means 'not in a professional manner or capacity'.

The following are miscellaneous examples of recent formations.

b. Un- is seldom prefixed to simple adverbs. Even in OE. such formations are rare, though a few do occur, as unéalle, unefne, unfegere, unfeorr, unseldan, unsófte. ME. retained most of these, but the number has at no time been greatly added to, and the later tendency is to discard such forms altogether.

12. The OE. use of un- with substantives (see 2 e above) survived very fully in ME., not only by the retention of old forms but by the introduction of many new, which continue to multiply in the later periods of the language. From the beginning the nouns have been almost entirely restricted to those of an abstract nature, so that forms with suffixes are numerous. In OE. and ME. the commonest of these is -ness (occasionally -dom and -ship); subsequently -ation, -ity, and -ment are frequent, as in the following selection of miscellaneous examples.

Florio (1611) has a certain number of casual formations, as unacknowledgement, unarrests, unbrittlenesse, unavoidingness, unelogquence, unfrailness, etc. Ash gives unadequateness, uncommensurability, -ableness, unfrugalness, unliableness, unorganicalness, and various others.

b. The prefixing of un- to nouns used attributively is rare and usually not intended seriously.

1673 Penn The Ch. of Quaker i. Wks. (1726) 522 The Unchristian Gospel-Rule to Believers. 1772 Lady Mary Coke Jrnl. 13 Aug., The reason of the discontent of the unquality Ladys is that they were laught at by the great Ladys. 1823 Byron Age of Bronze xiv, Alas, for poetry! how shall tongue or pen Bewail the 'unpoetry gentlemen? 1852 S. Other examples are uncurrency-style (1852), undining-room (1845), unhouschold-name (1894), unsociety-people (1898).

13. In OE. there are a few instances of un- with verbal substantives in -ung, as unbletsung, -hreowung, unmeltung, etc. None of these survive in ME., and new forms in -ing are rare; untinning occurs c 1250, uncunning c 1300, unknowing, unpunishing c 1340. In the later language the usage also remains rare, and in nearly all verbal sbs. the prefix un- is Un-[2]; a few exceptions are recorded here.

1538 Elyot, Insolentia,..unhauntinge of a place. 1598 Florio, Inexpultsum, the vnburying of one. Ibid., Ingenerabilitia, vnbegetting, ingeneralilitie. 1611 Florio, Inconservation, an vnmouing or not twinkling of the eies. 1823 R. (Cassell's), Why was this unowning of the plays necessary?

14. In OE. the use of un- with verbs is limited to formations from negative adjectives, as unclænsian, unrðtsian, untrymian from unclæne, unrót, untrum. (More commonly ge- is prefixed, as in geunclænsian, geunrðtian, etc.) This type barely survived in ME., but un- began to be sparingly prefixed to ordinary verbs, as untrowen (a 1200) to disbelieve, untrusten (a 1225) to distrust, unbetide not to happen, unbe not to be, and similar formations are fairly common in the 16–17th c., as unbecome, unbefit, unbelieve, unbeseem, uncomprehend, unconcern, etc. Many of these are obviously suggested by the participial adjectives (unbecoming, etc.), which are quite regular in formation (see 10 above). The type is now rare, but occasional examples occur.

15. By confusion of thought, un- is sometimes used redundantly, especially in the 16th and 17th centuries, where a positive term is really intended. For examples see undated (1637), undifference (1654), undifferency (1583).

Un-, prefix 2, expressing reversal or deprivation, representing OE. un-, on-, = OFris. und-, unt-, un-, ond-, ont-, on-, MDu. and Du. ont-, OS. ant-, OHG. ant-, int- (MHG. and G. ent-), Goth. ana- originally identical with AND- prefix.

2. From OE. more than a score of reversive verbs formed with un- (or its variant on-) are recorded as unbindan, uncnyttan, undón, unfeaðan, ungyrdan, unhelian, unlúcan, etc. Some of these were in common use; others occur rarely or in single instances. About half of the number (including all those mentioned above) survived in ME., and various new formations appear in texts from the first half of the 13th century, as unbenden, undytten, unfast(n)en, unhaspen, unhillen, unlimen, unmensken, unsteken; even at that date the prefix is used with verbs which are not of native origin. Similar formations from later ME. are unbuckle, uncatch, unclench, uncover, unfetter unkevel, unsew, unshut, unwrap, unyoke. The following are examples of obsolete ME. forms :—unha·dien [OE. unhádian], to deprive of ecclesiastical orders; unmensken [f. MENSK v.], to dishonour; unro·ne [f. RONE v.], to make desolate; hence unro·ningness; unteo·n [f. teon TEH v.] 6 b], to fall apart.

*c*1205 LAY. 13169 Buten he him plihte þæt he wolden worð rihtes 'unhadien [v. r. onhodi] Costanz. Ibid. 13174 þar he vnhadede his broðer. *a*1200 St. Marher. 14 Heanliunges make) ham wiò heouenlich hird ant 'unmenskeð hamseolf bimong eorðlich men. *a*1300 *E. b. In the 16th century new formations with un- become very numerous and varied, and in the 17th the prefix is used with much greater freedom than is now possible. The lexicographers Florio and Cotgrave constantly employ it in rendering Italian words in dis- and French words in dé-, des-. By this time the prefix had developed several variations of sense which are still current, and are illustrated by modern examples in the following sections.

3. In OE. most of the forms with un- have for their second part a simple verb, either strong (as unwindan, unfeaðan. unlúcan, etc.) or weak (as uncnyttan, undón, ungierwan, ungyrdan, etc.). In either case the prefix denotes a simple reversal of the action of the verb. Many of the new formations in ME. are of the same type, as unbend, unclench, uncover, unfasten, unhasp, unhide, unshut, etc., and additions to this class continue to be freely made at all subsequent periods. In addition to the numerous examples entered as main words, many others have been casually employed, similar to those here illustrated.

Florio and Cotgrave make extensive use of this type, e. g. unassury, unbrawl, uncancel, unclumse, unclutter, uncompass, uncurd, unfeather, unfrow, etc. Ash gives unbaste, unmoble, unsolder, unsort, etc.

4. A small number of OE. verbs in un- imply removal or deprivation; these end in -ian, as unhádian to deprive of orders, unhlidian to remove the lid from, uninnsglian to unseal, unsċġian to unshoe. In ME. the type remains rare, but occurs in unclead, unclothe, unhair. At a later date it becomes more frequent, and is common in modern use.

Florio is especially lavish in new formations which have not obtained subsequent currency, as unblossom, unbrain, unbridge, uncheek, unchease, uncorn, uncorner, unflank, unfringe, ungarland, etc.

1882 R. G. Ingersoll, etc. Chr. Relig. 44 Cradles would be robbed, and women's breasts 'unbabed. 1798 Ferriar *Illustr. b A modification of this sense is that of freeing or releasing from something. This appears in ME., in unfetter, unkevel, unyoke, although in origin these may be simply reversive. In the later period the type has become common, and is very largely represented from the close of the 16th century.

Florio and Cotgrave afford numerous examples, as unbarb, unbit, unbunch, unchaff, uncrupper, ungravel, unhunger, etc.

5. The use of un- to denote the removal or extraction (forcibly or otherwise) of a person or thing from a place or receptacle occurs in the 14th cent. in unhouse, and later in unbody, unearth, but does not become prominent till the beginning of the 17th, when Florio and Cotgrave afford many examples. In a few instances the sense passes into that of releasing or setting free from confinement, as in uncage, or of revealing to others, as in unbosom.

Among the instances occurring in Florio and Cotgrave are unaerie, unbench, unborough, unbrake, unchamber, unchest, unfirmer, etc.

1865 E. Burritt A walk to Land's End 375 Then he "unbasketed our dinner. 1897 Outing XXIX. 491/1 The request that a number of soldiers be sent back to "unbog the wagon. 1822 W. b. In some formations belonging to this type un- is prefixed to a word either denoting the thing removed or the action of removal; in the latter case the sense of the prefix passes into that of out. Examples of these uses are :—

1598 Florio, Sbacciellare, .. to vngraine, or take out of the cods. 1611 Cotgr., Escerner, to vnkernell; to take or cut a thing cleane out of the round place wherein it was. 1877 Talmage Serm. 316 He it is who undriks the lightning from the storm cloud.

6. In OE. the fact or process of depriving a person or thing of a certain quality or property was not expressed by the reversive un-, but by verbal formations based on adjectives already having the negative prefix (see Un-1 14), Unable, appearing towards the end of the 14th cent., may still belong to this type, but from the middle of the 16th century forms become frequent in which the prefix is clearly the reversive un-, employed both with adjs. and sbs. Both types are largely represented in Florio, and to a less extent in Cotgrave.

a. When the formation has an adjectival base, the adjective may be used in this simple form, or with the suffix -en.

Examples from Florio and Cotgr. of the simple adj. form are unbald, unbig, uncorpulent, unfussy, ungaddy, unhoar, etc.; and of forms in -en, unfatten, ungreaten, unmoisten, unsharpen, unthicken, unweaken.

1888 Ruskin in Pall Mall G. 27 Oct. 5/2 Rosalind is extremely glad to see Orlando "unbrowned again. 1893 Columbus (Ohio) Dispatch 19 Sept., They found..the shops ill-regulated and the Frenchmen "un-Frenched. 1827 Hare Guesses (1859) 488 You may abuse and misuse; you cannot "ungood. 1747 E. itself. 1826 Scott 19 Mar. in Croker Papers, If you "unscotch us you will find us damned mischievous Englishmen.

b. Substantives are similarly employed without ending.

Florio has a number of examples, as unbride, uncitizen, uncoward, undoctor, undwarf, etc. Casual formations are frequently employed by Fuller, as uncartinal, uncheplain, uncity, unmartyr, etc.

1807 Sir J. Y. Simpson in Duns Mem. xiv. (1873) 482 Often I wish I could "unbaronet myself. 1839 J. D. Coleridge in *Life Ld. c. From sbs. (rarely from adjs.) there are numerous formations in -(ɛ)fy, and from both sbs. and adjs. in -ize. Other endings, as -ate, are less usual.

7. With rare exceptions, the OE. verbs in un- are transitive, and this has always remained the prevailing use. In ME., however, intransitive uses of some common words are found, as unbend, unclose, unlouk, and in casual formations as unbody. In the later language the usage increases to some extent (as in unfold, etc.), but is chiefly confined to words having some currency.

Florio employs unday, undebt, undroop, unsicken, unswell. The following are rare modern instances.

1816 Colman Br. Lyrics, Champernowne ii, His courtiers swore..They'd broil a pope to keep a place, So all unpapalized apace. 1832 Tierlawny Adv. Younger Son II. 123 Look at him, he is unturbaning! 1862 Helps Org. Daily Life 108 The organization grinds on,..and it is very difficult to make the thing ungrind.

8. Verbal substantives, participial adjectives, and agent-nouns are naturally formed from verbs in un- as from simple verbs. These forms begin to appear in the 14th century, and become common in the later language.

Many of the past pples. and ppl. adjs., as unbent, unbound, undressed, unfastened, etc., coincide with formations in which the prefix is Un-1, and the distinction in meaning is not always sufficiently clear to admit of an absolute separation between the forms. Either prefix is normally unstressed in all participial formations used predicatively, but commonly receives the main stress when employed attributively, as an w'nent bow, an w'nbound book.

9. The redundant use of un- is rare, but occurs in OE. unlesean, and ME. unloose, which has succeeded in maintaining itself. Later instances are unbare, unsolve, unstrip (16–17th cent.), and the modern dialect forms unempt(y), unrid, unthaw (also locally uneave).

For occasional misuses of un- see unloaden, unranked.
